Disney sued America's Federal Communications Commission over the regulator's treatment of ABC, its TV network. Brendan Carr, the FCC's boss, insists that a review of ABC's licences is linked to an investigation into its diversity policies. Disney calls it an illegal attempt to quell free speech. Donald Trump has objected to criticism of him broadcast on ABC's programmes "The View" and "Jimmy Kimmel Live".

The United Arab Emirates said Iran fired two ballistic missiles towards it, both of which fell into the sea. The UAE said it remains on "high alert". Earlier, Mr Trump insisted that no talks are scheduled with Iran's regime, and claimed that the Strait of Hormuz is open. Mohammad Bagher Ghalibaf, Iran's parliamentary speaker, called members of the Trump administration a "clown crew".

China's foreign minister will visit Seoul on Wednesday, as South Korea's president seeks a formal end to the war with North Korea, China's ally. The conflict has been frozen since the 1950s. On Sunday Mr Trump said America would scale back military exercises with the South, and called Kim Jong Un, the North's dictator, "unthreatening and respectful". American and South Korean politicians expressed alarm at his comments.

Delaware Life, an insurer controlled by Mark Walter, a billionaire investor, is reducing lending to his other businesses by as much as $6.5bn. It follows a federal investigation into alleged fraud linked to $20bn in private-credit deals involving Mr Walter's insurance empire. Amid intensifying legal scrutiny, Mr Walter sold his controlling stake in the Los Angeles Lakers basketball team to Josh Kushner and Bob Iger for a record $12.5bn last week.

Zambia's president, Hakainde Hichilema, secured a second five-year term with over 60% of the vote in an election viewed as a referendum on his economic reforms. He took over after a debt crisis in 2020. However, his victory caused tension in the copper-rich country. On Friday, authorities arrested opposition figures for allegedly planning a revolt—a charge denied by his main challenger, Brian Mundubile.

Mike Ashley, a British retail tycoon, increased his stake in Hugo Boss to 48%. Mr Ashley's company, Frasers Group, is trying to take over Germany's biggest luxury fashion firm; Hugo Boss's board had recommended shareholders reject his offer of €38 ($44) a share. Mr Ashley, who founded Sports Direct, a cheap sporting-goods shop, is going upmarket. Last week he bought Harvey Nichols, a posh but struggling British department store.

A Russian court sentenced a prominent anti-war politician to more than 11 years in a penal colony. Lev Shlosberg, the deputy head of the liberal Yabloko party, has repeatedly called for a ceasefire with Ukraine. He was found guilty of “discrediting” the country's armed forces and “spreading false information”. Separately, Russia's Supreme Court upheld a ban preventing Yabloko taking part in September's parliamentary elections.

US in Brief: “Inane, haphazard” and helping Russia

Photograph: 210th Field Artillery Brigade

Jack Reed, the leading Democrat on the Senate’s armed-services committee, criticised the “inane, haphazard” decision by Donald Trump to cut back military exercises with South Korea. The president on Sunday based his decision on his chummy relationship with Kim Jong Un, North Korea’s dictator, and linked it to South Korea’s refusal to help him in Iran. Republicans mostly kept quiet but Thom Tillis, an outgoing senator who has clashed with the president, said cancelling the exercises would free up North Korean troops to help Russia in Ukraine.

The Justice Department announced a process for people with criminal convictions to restore their gun rights. Current law bars those convicted of a crime punishable by more than a year in prison or of misdemeanour domestic violence, as well as undocumented immigrants and sex offenders. The department said appeals will take into account subsequent behaviour; “violent felons, registered sex offenders, [and] illegal aliens” would remain barred.

A federal judge ruled in favour of moving the FBI headquarters to Maryland despite opposition from the Trump administration. The bureau’s old headquarters are dilapidated and face security concerns. In 2023 Maryland won a bidding process and Congress appropriated the money. But Kash Patel, the FBI’s director, and the Trump administration decided to move to another building in Washington, DC—unlawfully, the judge ruled.

The White House launched an unusually personal attack on a CNN reporter who had asked the president about his relationship with Natalie Harp, a young aide: “Someday, your children will come across your disgusting and inhumane question. They will be sickened and embarrassed,” the rapid-response team wrote. Kristen Holmes had asked Mr Trump to respond to insinuations about Ms Harp from Jon Osoff, a Democratic senator. Steven Cheung, Mr Trump’s attack dog, called him “Jon Jackoff...the biggest cuck loser in politics”.

The Trump administration temporarily paused plans to build a border wall through Big Bend National Park in Texas. Rodney Scott, the commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, said this was so that he could visit to “evaluate the terrain and listen to local leadership, community members and stakeholders”. The wall’s construction has been criticised by both Democrats and Republicans, who fear it will damage the park’s ecosystem.

America-Canada talks go down to the wire

America and Canada have until the end of Tuesday to reach a deal. Without an agreement, Donald Trump has vowed to apply new 50% tariffs on around $20bn worth of Canadian goods, effective from midnight. There has been some progress, but talks are expected to go right down to the final hours. Should Mr Trump carry out his threat, it will add to Canada's woes: existing tariffs of up to 50% have already battered its automotive, aluminium and wood sectors.

A central demand from Mr Trump is for eight Canadian provinces to restock American booze on supermarket shelves, following boycotts in response to earlier levies. In return Canada wants lower tariffs on goods such as lumber and cars. Canada's protected dairy market is also a target of American negotiators. Ordinary Canadians despise the president's bullying tactics. Polls suggest they are in no mood to see their leaders accommodate Mr Trump.

Will Germany's mood continue to brighten?

Photograph: DPA

Gloomy German spirits seem to be lifting. Data released on Tuesday show the ZEW Indicator of Economic Sentiment, which measures investor confidence, rose by almost a third in August compared with July, continuing a climb out of a slump deepened by America's war against Iran.

Europe's largest economy appears to have momentum. In June new orders in manufacturing unexpectedly rose by 3.1% compared with a month earlier and exports were up nearly 1% from May. Friedrich Merz, the chancellor, offered a further boost last month, unveiling sweeping economic reforms, including €10bn ($11bn) in tax relief for people on lower incomes. He also proposed changes to the pension system, among them a higher retirement age.

There are problems, however. The five successive heatwaves that hit Europe this summer have severely disrupted trade along the country's parched rivers. Searing temperatures could shave as much as 0.5% off Germany's GDP. And with no respite yet from Europe's record-breaking drought, the cost could rise further still.

Is big tech the new big tobacco?

Meta goes on trial on Tuesday, facing accusations by four American states of designing Facebook and Instagram in order to harm children. Opening arguments begin in a federal court in Oakland, California, with the lead plaintiffs—California, Colorado, Kentucky and New Jersey—alleging that Meta crafted its platforms to keep children hooked and misled the public about their safety. They are among 29 states also claiming Meta collected data from children without parental consent.

Meta faces thousands of other federal lawsuits. A judge in San Francisco recently rejected an appeal by Meta and TikTok that they were protected under Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act, clearing the path for further claims. And earlier this year courts in Los Angeles and New Mexico found Meta and Google negligent for designing platforms harmful to young people. With these latest charges, the plaintiffs are reportedly seeking almost $200bn from the social-media giant. Meta, which says it has long supported youngsters, disputes the allegations.

Tata's turmoil is far from over

For months, Tata, an Indian conglomerate that sells everything from salt to software, has been consumed by boardroom drama. The most recent twist came last week, when the board's chair, Natarajan Chandrasekaran, unexpectedly announced he would step down after his term ends in February 2027.

Mr Chandrasekaran runs Tata Sons, the holding company for the conglomerate, which is majority-owned by Tata Trusts, a collection of charitable trusts. Noel Tata, chair of Tata Trusts, clashed with Mr Chandrasekaran over whether the holding company should go public, which Mr Tata has reportedly resisted. The pair also disagreed over broader strategy and the succession plan for Mr Chandreskaran.

None of this is immediately resolved by Mr Chandreskaran's surprise announcement. Nor will Tata's annual general meeting on Tuesday offer much relief. The meeting is expected to be adjourned after one of the trusts warned it may not send a representative, blocking the board's ability to vote. Investors hoping for clarity will have to wait.

Democratic hopes dim in the Sunshine State

On Tuesday voters in Florida will pick the Republican and Democratic candidates for governor in one of the country's final primary elections before midterms in November. Byron Donalds, a congressman, leads the Republican field. His likely opponent is David Jolly, a one-time Republican who left the party in opposition to Donald Trump. The Democrats face steep odds: the Sunshine State has not elected a governor from the party since 1994.

Ron DeSantis, the departing governor, transformed Florida over his nearly eight years in office, during which time its GDP growth has outpaced the national average and big firms such as Palantir moved there. His decision to open the state during the covid-19 pandemic attracted conservatives fleeing lockdowns in Democratic-run cities such as New York and Chicago. His “war on woke” then turned the state into a laboratory for Republican policy. Today Florida serves as the president's adoptive home, where foreign leaders come to curry favour. It was once America's quintessential swing state. Now it's MAGA-land.
