

World in Brief: Iran's demands threaten to derail Hormuz reopening; wildfires roar through Canada

Photograph: Anadolu via Getty Images

Iran issued a sweeping set of demands that it said America must meet before it will reopen the Strait of Hormuz. The list includes lifting America's naval blockade and sanctions on Iran, as well as the payment of reparations and the withdrawal of American forces from around the country. Iran had been negotiating with Oman over management of the strait. Its new demands have dimmed hopes that the flow of traffic would resume soon.

British Columbia declared a state of emergency as a fast-moving wildfire ravaged the Canadian province. The Bald Range fire has already consumed around 9,500 hectares of land, much of it agricultural. Around 20,000 people were ordered to evacuate.

Factory-gate prices in China grew at a slower pace than expected in July. The country's producer price index rose by 3.5% year on year, down from 4.1% the month before. Consumer prices, meanwhile, rose by 0.5% over the same period, the smallest increase since January. Lower domestic oil prices helped to curtail both measures.

Two bomb attacks rocked Colombia on the first day in office of its new right-wing firebrand president, Abelardo de la Espriella. The country's armed forces blamed rebels who had separated from the FARC militia for injuring two security guards with a car bomb near Cali, a southwestern city. Separately, an officer was killed in a drone strike in Cesar, a northern department.

Two planes almost collided at Australia's busiest airport in Sydney. A Jetstar A320 flight with more than 100 passengers was preparing to take off when an empty Qatar Airways Boeing 777, a much larger plane, was tugged onto the taxiway. The pilots were instructed to "brake firmly". No one was seriously hurt, but Australia's transport-safety regulator said it had launched an investigation.

Berkshire Hathaway's chief executive, Greg Abel, spent a net $19.8bn on stocks during the second quarter, ending a three-year selling streak by his predecessor, Warren Buffett, that signalled caution over elevated market valuations. The investments include a $10bn stake in Alphabet. He also bought back $4.5bn of Berkshire Hathaway's own stock. Quarterly profits from the firm's core businesses rose 16% year over year to around $13bn.

FIFA defended its president, Gianni Infantino, amid mounting criticism of a misfired plan to sell commercial stakes in its tournaments. Football's governing body said that there was a "concerted and ongoing effort" to undermine Mr Infantino. FIFA's president denied allegations made by the Daily Telegraph, a British newspaper, that he had paid off a former lover while working for UEFA, European football's governing body.

Word of the week: haigui, or sea turtles in Chinese, describing those who come back to China after their studies abroad. Last year the proportion of returnees was 94% of outbound students, an all-time high.

Have you been following the headlines? Test your knowledge of the news with our weekly quiz.

South-East Asia gets hazy

Photograph: Reuters

Singaporeans will look to the skies on Sunday when their country celebrates its National Day with a grand fireworks display. But they may struggle to see clearly. Earlier this week South-East Asia's weather forecaster raised its haze alert to the second-highest level after reports of fires on peatlands and plantations in the Indonesian territories of Kalimantan and Sumatra, which often cause smoke to drift across the region.

Such blazes have recently become more common during the dry season, which runs from June to October. This year meteorologists expect a strong El Niño to make conditions worse. The weather pattern helped fuel one of South-East Asia's worst hazes on record in 2015. The resulting air pollution is estimated to have caused more than 100,000 excess deaths. It also prompted soul-searching and a flurry of policy measures, from tougher enforcement of crop-burning to closer regional co-operation. In the coming weeks, those measures may face trial by fire.

Edinburgh's exuberant, exorbitant Fringe

Photograph: Getty Images

The world's largest arts festival returns with gusto this weekend. Edinburgh is plastered with posters promoting the Fringe's 4,200 shows, more than ever before. In 2025 2.6m tickets were sold during the month-long jamboree. And this year's eclectic lineup promises to pull in the punters. Visitors can watch theatre in a sauna, stand-up comedy by Amanda Knox (who was convicted, then acquitted, of murdering a student in 2007) or a musical about a Nebraskan sect that wears butt plugs.

But Edinburgh's landlords will have the last laugh. The price of accommodation during August has rocketed by 300% over the past six years. The city has introduced a 5% tourist tax on overnight stays; performers are not exempt. Meanwhile, a cost-of-staging crisis means many will struggle to break even. The likes of Alan Rickman, Stephen Fry and Phoebe Waller-Bridge all credit the Fringe for launching their careers. For performers, though, this catalyst does not come cheap.

Can the Patriot Games excite Americans?

Photograph: freedom250.org

Donald Trump's events celebrating America's 250th birthday have so far been less than spectacular. A cage fight on the White House lawn in June, which one organiser promised would attract "Super Bowl-type numbers", was broadcast only on Paramount+. (Over 100m people watch the Super Bowl; fewer than that subscribe to the streaming service.) Even MAGA diehards deemed the "Great American State Fair", which was held in Washington, DC, amid scorching temperatures, not worth the risk of heat stroke. So organisers will be hoping that the Patriot Games, which begin on Sunday in Ohio, prove more popular.

The event is billed as a "national athletic competition celebrating the character, determination, and excellence that define the American spirit". Some 120 teenage boys and girls, representing American states, territories and tribal nations, will compete for a shared $250,000 scholarship prize. In reality, the competition will probably resemble a gym class. Over three days the contenders will play kickball, dodgeball and other games. Wholesome, but not exactly a recipe for ratings success.

Weekend profile: Mohammed VI, Morocco's distracted king

Photograph: Getty Images

Nothing was allowed to interrupt Throne Day on July 30th, an annual ritual in which Morocco's elite swear allegiance to the king. Not even the deaths of more than 140 migrants who were crushed as 72,000 people surged towards the Spanish exclave of Ceuta. The security chiefs who should have dispatched reinforcements were just 16 miles away, attending the ceremonies at the royal palace in M'diq. Too busy bowing and hand-kissing to answer their phones, they left border posts all but abandoned. Officers who had spent months keeping would-be migrants at bay had been redeployed to guard the festivities. Only after the ceremony ended, five hours later, were they sent back. As images of desperate Moroccans flashed around the world, state television remained transfixed by the pageantry of the elite. For the makhzen, as Morocco's ruling establishment is known, protocol trumps all.

Mohammed VI once promised to be a different kind of ruler. When he succeeded his father, Hassan II, in 1999, he seemed like a breath of fresh air. He toured undeveloped and sometimes unruly areas his father had shunned, earning the moniker "the king of the poor". He dismissed his father's ruthless enforcers, released political prisoners and modernised the country with motorways and high-speed rail. He married—then, to high society's astonishment, divorced—a commoner; swapped suits for T-shirts; went jet-skiing; and spent long holidays in Paris and Gabon with kickboxers, nightclub owners and comedians.

Over time, however, the makhzen reasserted itself. As Mohammed VI's health declined, the state-run media exposed the king's kickboxer friends as gangsters and drove them from public view. Increasingly the makhzen looked to his more disciplined and sterner son, Crown Prince Hassan, for leadership; in May he was appointed co-ordinator of the armed forces. The palace appointed an Islamist prime minister to mollify the Arab Spring protests in 2011, but replaced him in 2017 and later backed the elevation of favoured oligarchs to the post. Critics were locked up on trumped-up sex-crime charges. Too frail to resist, the king has acquiesced. When Gen Z-led protests erupted last year, the response was water cannon and jail terms for some 1,400 young Moroccans. Like his father before him, Mohammed VI has come to embody a monarchy in which ceremony takes precedence. In the wake of Ceuta, he announced that he had named a $1bn highway in the disputed territory of the Western Sahara, on the opposite end of the country, after Donald Trump (who blamed the tragedy on Spain's socialist government). When disasters strike, the monarch is otherwise engaged.

Mini crossword

Illustration: The Economist

We publish a new interactive edition of our crossword daily, allowing you to enter and check the answers and see explanations. Try it here. Or, if you prefer, use the clues below.

There are two sets of clues, one for seasoned cruciverbalists and the other for less experienced solvers. Both give the same answers.

Cryptic clues

1 across - Animal eats Ron's first cut of chicken (6)

2 across - Assassin hiding in bamboo thicket (5)

3 across - Cowardly shout. That hurts! (6)

1 down - Fuzzy busy bee is trapped inside fruit (9)

Straight clues

1 across - Robin's is orange actually, not red (6)

2 across - Compartment; small office (5)

3 across - Coldplay's first global hit (6)

1 down - Superfood (9)

Better to die on your feet than live on your knees!

Emiliano Zapata