

World in Brief: Iran vows sanctions retaliation; Trump escalates trade war with Canada

Iran vowed to retaliate against America's expanded sanctions regime, having earlier warned that “not a single drop of oil” would leave the Gulf if the pressure continued. On Monday Scott Bessent, America's treasury secretary, threatened broader measures against Iran's trading partners, targeting sectors including digital assets, technology and shipping—although he did not name any countries nor set any deadlines. China, a large buyer of Iranian oil, said its trade with Iran “should not be disrupted”.

Officials from Pakistan said “significant progress” was made to end the war in Iran, as they concluded a visit to Tehran. The country has been one of the main mediators during the conflict. During the trip Asim Munir, Pakistan's army chief, held talks with Iran's leaders that focused on measures including re-opening the Strait of Hormuz. He reportedly spoke with Donald Trump beforehand.

Mr Trump said America will raise tariffs on Canadian cars, automotive parts and steel to 50%, beginning on January 1st, further escalating a dispute after trade negotiations collapsed last week. America had already imposed 50% tariffs on $20bn-worth of Canadian goods. Mark Carney, Canada's prime minister, has pledged to hit back with levies on American products including steel, dairy and electronics from September 8th.

Germany's economic fortunes seem to be improving. Revised data showed that GDP grew by 0.3% in the second quarter from the first, up from an initial estimate of 0.2%. Business sentiment also grew by more than expected in August. The economy has now expanded for three consecutive quarters, helped by a recovery in manufacturing and stronger exports.

Russian authorities denied knowledge of an American military plane which landed near Moscow. Flight-tracking data showed the aircraft travelled from a military base in America via Latvia. The last American plane confirmed to have flown from Europe to Russia arrived in January, carrying envoys for negotiations over Ukraine. However the Kremlin said no talks were planned this week. American officials offered no explanation for the incident.

Taiwanese prosecutors charged nine people, including an Nvidia employee, with smuggling chips into China. The suspects also include two senior employees of Super Micro, an American hardware firm. Prosecutors say the group sent 74 servers containing advanced chips to China via Japan and Indonesia, circumventing American sanctions, and tried to ship 56 more. Authorities have not accused either company of being involved.

The Securities and Exchange Commission reportedly subpoenaed several Wall Street banks over the implosion of Situational Awareness, an AI-focused hedge fund. The regulator wants information on the fund's trading activity and its conversations with the lenders that provided it leverage. Situational Awareness borrowed enormous sums to invest in AI, but was forced into a fire-sale of assets during a sell-off of tech assets in July.

Figure of the day: 21%, the proportion of votes Volodymyr Zelensky would receive in a presidential election, according to a poll. Our story explores Ukraine's growing political divisions.

Correction: In Saturday's edition we wrote that the Tour de France cut short a time trial by 30km because of extreme heat. In fact it was a normal road stage that was shortened by this distance.

US in Brief: Stamp of approval for attack on mail-in ballots

The Supreme Court allowed Donald Trump to implement some restrictions on mail-in ballots, for now. Justices paused a ruling by a lower court that blocked the president from implementing parts of an executive order directing the postal service to oversee the ballots. It is uncertain if his rules can be implemented before November's midterms: there is a separate block on other parts of the order.

Scott Bessent, the treasury secretary, announced Operation Economic Outcast, “an economic onslaught against Iran’s financial connections around the globe”. As well as enforcing its blockade of Iranian oil exports, America will increase pressure on Iran’s trading partners and on financial institutions that facilitate trade. But the threats are more bark than bite: countries do not have to comply with America’s demands immediately. Mr Bessent described it as a “warning shot”.

Backlash to the escalating trade war with Canada gained momentum, as American business leaders and Democratic officials warned it will push up prices. On Monday Mr Trump said America will raise tariffs on Canadian cars, automotive parts and steel to 50%, having already imposed 50% tariffs on $20bn-worth of Canadian goods after trade negotiations collapsed last week. Mark Carney, Canada's prime minister, has promised retaliatory levies.

Alabama's attorney-general subpoenaed OpenAI for more information about an incident in which several of the lab's AI agents escaped a testing environment and hacked into Hugging Face, an AI platform, in July. The state is investigating whether OpenAI violated consumer-protection laws and poses a threat to citizens. Earlier this month a multi-state coalition that includes Alabama sent a letter to OpenAI demanding accountability. OpenAI said an in-depth review is under way.

Rob Bonta, California's attorney-general, cancelled a meeting on Monday with Paramount, accusing the company of leaking and misrepresenting ongoing discussions about a settlement related to its \$111bn merger with Warner Bros Discovery. California is one of 12 states suing Paramount to block the tie-up, which they say will give the company greater leverage over cinemas and cable distributors. Paramount denied responsibility for the leak.

The race to succeed Lindsey Graham

On Tuesday Republicans in South Carolina will go to the polls for the fourth time this summer to choose their candidate to replace Lindsey Graham, a senator who died in July after more than two decades on Capitol Hill. His sister, Darline Graham, appointed by the governor to fill his seat temporarily, faces Ralph Norman, a congressman and member of the House Freedom Caucus, a hardline conservative group. Ms Graham has clinched an endorsement from Donald Trump. On Friday he flew to Myrtle Beach to campaign with her.

She is the strong favourite, but has had a poor campaign. In a debate last week Ms Graham stumbled over a question about China and Taiwan before conceding that “national security is not my thing”. The gaffe highlighted how green she is on the foreign-policy issues that her brother made central to his career. Republicans looking for someone to fill his role as a hawkish voice against MAGA isolationism may be disappointed.

Trump's economic war on Iran may backfire

Photograph: Getty Images

On Monday Scott Bessent, America's treasury secretary, announced “Operation Economic Outcast” against Iran. While continuing its blockade of Iranian oil exports, America plans to increase pressure on the regime's trading partners and institutions that help it move money. Mr Bessent warned of new sanctions targeting sectors such as technology and shipping. But America took no immediate action against individual countries, such as China, which buys more than 80% of Iranian crude exports.

Iran is in dire economic straits. Its oil exports have collapsed, the rial has hit a record low and inflation is soaring. But squeezing it further will be difficult. China, for one, may resist American pressure. And the Iranian regime could respond with force, by attacking countries that co-operate with America or targeting energy facilities and ships in the Gulf. Donald Trump hopes economic strangulation will succeed where bombs and diplomacy failed. It could instead trigger another round of fighting.

Lego builds on its success

Photograph: Getty Images

Around two decades ago Lego nearly went bankrupt. The company had strayed from its multicoloured interlocking bricks as video games and digital entertainment took hold. That lesson stuck and Lego returned to its roots. Its sales have since grown more than ten-fold to Dkr83.5bn ($13bn)—more than those of Mattel and Hasbro, its two biggest rivals, combined. On Tuesday it reported net profits of Dkr8.6bn, an increase of a third on a year before.

Nostalgia is one building block of its success. Lego is courting grown-ups happy to splurge on pricey collector sets. Replicas of the Sagrada Familia and the Eiffel tower, designed to be showcased rather than played with, sell for more than £500 ($680). Kidults now account for a fifth of sales.

The digital threat has not disappeared. Lego has reportedly tripled its software-engineering workforce since 2022 as a result. Its YouTube channel boasts more than 21m subscribers. Yet the core of Lego's mission remains its colourful plastic bricks—virtually unchanged since the 1950s.

A worrying turn for Zambian democracy

Photograph: Martin Mbangweta/Xinhua News Agency/eyevine

Last week Hakainde Hichilema was declared the winner of Zambia's presidential election. The president's opponents have until Tuesday to challenge his re-election in court. There is one problem: on Monday the courts were closed indefinitely with authorities citing security concerns. That leaves little time for Brian Mundubile, the main opposition candidate.

Police have also summoned Mr Mundubile as the government investigates what it says was a planned insurrection. On August 14th security forces shot dead one of Mr Mundubile's associates, and arrested 11 others. He has sought protection from the UN, claiming that he won the election and the result was stolen from him. A group of Zambian churches, which monitored the count, thinks that Mr Hichilema won, but by less than the electoral commission claims. The dispute marks a worrying turn for a country whose record of peaceful transfers of power has long set it apart in the region.

A ruling on one of Turkey's political prisoners

Photograph: Serra Akcan/NARphotos/eyevine

On Tuesday Europe's top human-rights court will rule once again on the imprisonment of Osman Kavala, a Turkish philanthropist who has spent almost nine years behind bars. In 2019 the European Court of Human Rights ordered his release, finding that his detention was politically motivated (Turkey had accused him of organising the Gezi Park protests, anti-government demonstrations that swept the country in 2013). The Turkish government did not comply. After a retrial, Mr Kavala was convicted in 2022 of attempting to overthrow the government and sentenced to life in prison.

The court will now decide whether the trial which led to that conviction violated his rights. Yet even if the court rules in Mr Kavala's favour, it may make little difference. The EU, once vocal about his imprisonment, has grown quieter as Turkey (a NATO member) has become more important to its security. As such, Strasbourg's judges are more likely to offer Mr Kavala vindication than freedom.
